About Potato

The potato is a tuber grown underground on a specialized plant part (subterranean stem) known as stolon. Therefore, it is a modified stem in a strict botanical sense. A potato tuber is usually oval to round in shape, although intermediate shapes are also frequently encountered. It consists of an inner flesh and an outer protective cover known as a skin. There is a great variation in flesh colour and skin finish. And these two characteristics broadly, if not completely determine the consumer preference vis-à-vis acceptability. The eye shaped depressions on a potato tuber is known as its eyes, and actually these are the dormant buds, which give rise to new shoots under suitable conditions. These white to creamy white or pigmented new shoots are known as sprouts. This is a very important process in potato, because a sprouted potato is not acceptable for consumption. But optimum sprouting is a desired attribute when the tubers are used for propagation.

In contrast to most of the major food crops (cereals) which are propagated through seeds (products of sexual hybridization), a potato plant is propagated through tubers. The tubers meant for propagation are known as seed tubers or seed potatoes. The main advantage of vegetative propagation is that a good potato clone can be maintained with a high degree of genetic purity. It is often colloquial to call a potato plant as a clone, because it is advanced through the generations by clonal propagation, another term of asexual or vegetative propagation. The disadvantage is that many deadly viruses and seed-borne pathogens are progressively accumulated in the tubers and carried over repeated multiplication's resulting in the gradual degeneration of a clone. For this reason, successful potato cultivation and production depend upon the availability of disease free high quality seed tubers. In addition to tubers, a potato plant can also be propagated through botanical seeds, which are known as True Potato Seeds (TPS). Since potato is a bulky perishable commodity and its harvest in sub-tropical conditions as in India is followed by high temperatures, it requires being stored at low temperatures.

In a potato tuber, about 80% is water and the rest is dry matter. Starch is the major component of the dry matter accounting for approximately 70% of the total solids. The potato can be distinguished from cereals like rice and wheat for its higher capacity to produce dry matter, which is about 47.6kg/hectare/day. The average composition of a potato tuber is as follows; dry matter (20%), starch (13-16%), total sugars (0-2%), protein (2%), fibre (0.5%), lipids (0.1%), vitamin A (trace/100g fresh weight), vitamin C (31 mg/100 g fresh weight), mineral (trace), ash (1-1.5%), amylose (22-25%) and glycoalkaloids (1 mg/100g fresh weight) as an antinutritional factor.

A potato tuber also contains a number of B-group vitamins and high quality dietary fibre. The potato produces more edible protein per hectare per day (about 3 kg) than rice and wheat. And most importantly, the biological value of potato protein is about 71% that of whole egg, a figure much better than that of wheat, maize, peas and beans and even comparable to milk. Equally impressive is the capacity of the potato to produce the minerals, which is about 4-and 11 times more than that of wheat and rice, respectively. The potato is low energy food (97 kcal/100g fresh weight), because it contains low fat (0.1%) and calorie. Therefore, it is a misconception that potato causes obesity. In all, the potato is a highly nutritious, easily digestible, wholesome food. It is a unique food, because it can be consumed as boiled, fried or processed, all with equal culinary delicacy.

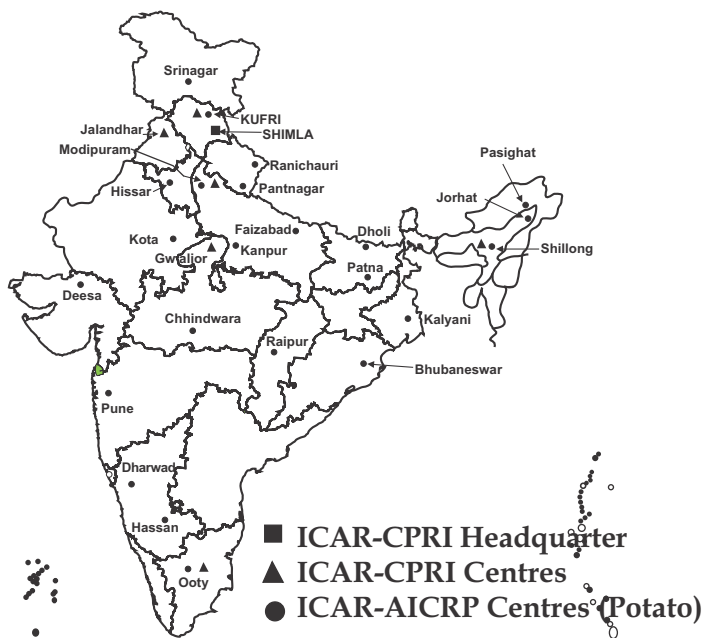

The potato is not native to India. It originated in the environs of Lake Titicaca high in the Andes of Peru and Bolivia in South America. Following the discovery of the New World, the potato was introduced into Europe. It is believed that the potatoes were introduced into India in late 16th century probably by British missionaries or Portuguese traders.

About ICAR-Central Potato Research Institute

There was a growing need of scientific potato research in the country. Immediately after independence, the ICAR-Central Potato Research Institute was established in 1949 at Patna with three research stations at Bhowali, Kufri and Shimla. Later in 1956, the Shimla research station was converted to the institute's headquarters. Because the potato plants flower under long-day conditions of the high hills at Kufri/Shimla, hybridization can be done there. Besides, the production and maintenance of healthy potato seeds was only possible in Kufri/Shimla hills at that time. Today the ICAR-CPRI is a premier national research institute affiliated to the Indian Council of Agricultural Research, New Delhi. It operates with seven regional research stations in different potato growing areas of the country. These regional research stations are located in Gwalior, Jalandhar, Kufri, Modipuram, Ootacamund, Patna and Shillong. The tremendous growth of potato production and development in the country is due to more than five decades of concerted research efforts of the ICAR-CPRI. The institute has been successful in developing different potato varieties for diverse agro-ecological zones of the country. A strong indigenous varietal improvement programme has resulted in the development of 48 high yielding multiple disease resistant potato varieties till date. However, the most significant contribution the ICAR-CPRI is credited with is the development of “Seed Plot Technique” for the production of disease free healthy potato seed. This technique has allowed the production of potato seed in sub-tropical Indian plains under low-aphid period during October to early January. It is sustaining the national Potato Seed Production Programme. Over the years, the institute has been successful in developing many cost effective technologies for post harvest management and processing of the potatoes. The role of ICAR-CPRI in establishing a cold chain in the country for potato storage by forging a synergy between public and private investments is equally impressive. The institute did not also lag behind in developing suitable technologies for potato processing, disease forecasting and management, cropping system, precision farming, nutrient management and remote sensing. Equally commendable is its achievements in application of biotechnology for potato improvement. All these efforts have led to India ranking presently third both in potato area (2.2 million hectare) and 2nd in production (48.60 million tonnes) in the world with an average yield (22.1 tonnes/hectare). In this millennium, the potato has various challenges for securing the food and nutrition in the country. The ICAR-CPRI is prepared to address these challenges in collaboration with its different national and international partners to sustain potato production & development.
